THINGS TO KNOW

KRISTIN TOUSSAINT, REPORTER

Stories of the Trump administration's practice of separating migrant families at the border have flooded the news cycle recently. The images were horrifying to many: tales of babies taken from their parents' arms, and more than a thousand migrant boys holed up in a former Walmart. The backlash has not seemed to affect anyone in the administration, but it has reached Gov. Charlie Baker's ears. Baker had planned to send Massachusetts National Guard members to aid President Trump's immigration efforts, but in light of all these "inhumane" details, he has canceled that plan. Read more about why inside and at metro.boston.us.

WELCOME TO METRO BOSTONSPACE-FOCUSED MILITARY
BRANCH IN THE WORKS

President Donald Trump on Monday said he was ordering the creation of a sixth branch of the military to focus on space, a move critics said could harm the Air Force. "It is not enough to merely have an American presence in space. We must have American dominance in space," Trump said before a meeting of his National Space Council. "We are going to have the Air Force and we're going to have the 'Space Force.' Separate but equal. It is going to be something," he said later. The United States is a member of the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, which bars the stationing of weapons of mass destruction in space and only allows for the use of the moon and other celestial bodies for peaceful purposes. The idea of a Space Force has been raised before, by Trump and previous administrations, with proponents saying it would make the Pentagon more efficient. It has also faced criticism from senior military officials. Air Force Chief of Staff General David Goldfein told a 2017 congressional hearing that creating a new space branch would "move us in the wrong direction."

WHITE HOUSE DEFENDS
IMMIGRATION POLICY

The Trump administration on Monday defended its hardline immigration policy at the U.S.-Mexico border as criticism mounted over detained immigrant parents being separated from their children, including video of youngsters sitting in concrete-floored cages. While Democrats blasted such treatment as "barbaric" and some Republicans also voiced concerns, Department of Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen said the administration was only strictly enforcing immigration law. "This administration did not create a policy of separating families at the border. ... What has changed is that we no longer exempt entire classes of people who break the law," she told reporters at a White House briefing. The family separations result from Trump's "zero tolerance" policy that provides for the arrest of all adults caught trying to enter the United States illegally, including those seeking asylum. While parents are held in jail, their children are sent to separate detention facilities. Video footage released by the government showed migrant children held in wire cages, sitting on concrete floors.

JUDGE CANCELS HEARING IN STORMY DANIELS CASE

4 A Los Angeles judge has canceled a June 21 hearing at which a lawyer for adult film actress Stormy Daniels planned to seek the resumption of her lawsuit there against President Donald Trump and his longtime lawyer Michael Cohen. According to an order issued on Monday, U.S. District Judge James Otero decided it was unnecessary to hear arguments on the request by Daniels' lawyer Michael Avenatti to lift a 90-day stay imposed on April 28. Otero will rule on the request later. In imposing the stay, the judge cited the potential overlap between Daniels' lawsuit and a separate criminal probe by federal prosecutors in Manhattan that he said could result in Cohen's indictment. Daniels is suing to end an agreement under which Cohen paid her $130,000 not to discuss an alleged intimate relationship she had with Trump beginning in 2006 and continuing in 2007. Her lawsuit also includes a claim that Cohen defamed her by implying that she had lied about her relationship with Trump. The president has denied having sex with Daniels, whose real name is Stephanie Clifford.

HEAT WAVE WILTS MUCH OF US MIDWEST, NORTHEAST

5 Chicago and St. Louis sweltered on Monday at the center of a heat wave that stretched across the Midwest and Northeast, although relief could come as soon as that evening in some areas. After a hot weekend, the temperature reached 91 in Chicago and 92 in St. Louis by early afternoon, the National Weather Service said, with both cities opening air-conditioned cooling centers to the public. The heat index, which factors in humidity, hit 100 in St. Louis. Similar heat in Detroit compelled the city to announce it would close many public schools three hours early on Monday, the Detroit News reported. "This type of heat wave is typical for early summer," said Bob Oravec, a weather service forecaster, adding everywhere from Kansas City, Missouri, to Boston and Washington were experiencing above-average temperatures. "It's not astronomical" Cleveland, Ohio, broke a record on Sunday for its hottest June 17 on record with the mercury reaching 94, Oravec said. New York's Central Park reached a high of 90 degrees on Monday, according to Accuweather. Newark, New Jersey, topped at a sweltering 96 degrees.

Baker reverses course, takes back offer to send flight crew to southern border

The governor cited the Trump administration's recent "inhumane" treatment of immigrant children at the border for his decision.

In a sudden reversal, Gov. Charlie Baker's administration on Monday canceled its plan to send Massachusetts National Guard members and equipment to the southwestern U.S. border in light of the federal government's "inhumane" practice of separating undocumented children from their families, the governor's office said.

Baker announced on June 1 that he would send a UH-72 Lakota helicopter and two military analysts to pilot the chopper to the southwestern border by the end of the month in support of President Donald Trump's mission to curb illegal border crossings and drug trafficking.

But in recent weeks the federal government's practice of separating undocumented children from their parents when detained at the border has drawn bipartisan scorn and ignited a donnybrook between the White House and Congress. Baker, a Republican who did not support Trump, registered his disapproval Monday.

"Gov. Baker directed the National Guard not to send any assets or personnel to the Southwest border today because the federal government's current actions are resulting in the inhumane treatment of children," Baker Communications

"This statistic reveals the lack of an orderly and fair process to manage the escalating flow of illegal immigrants."

The White House

Director Lizzy Guyton said in a statement.

Baker's office said Massachusetts has no personnel or assets participating in the border mission.

The flight crew had been expected to deploy by the end of June to work through September with the Arizona National Guard and the New Mexico National Guard, in coordination with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, to provide air reconnaissance and track illegal activity along the border with Mexico.

In its daily email newsletter Monday, the White House said that the "harshest family separation policy is that too many Americans have been permanently separated from loved ones because of crime spilling across our border" and highlighted the need for more security along the border.

"Illegal immigration along our Southwest border surged 230 percent in April compared to last year, according to the Department of Homeland Security," the White House wrote. "This statistic reveals the lack of an orderly and fair process to manage the escalating flow of illegal immigrants. That flawed system creates both a humanitarian and a national security crisis at our border."

Trump in April ordered the Pentagon and Department of Homeland Security to deploy National Guard troops to the southern border to assist federal border agents, indicating at the time that he would like to see 2,000 to 4,000 National Guard troops called up.

Baker's announcement that he would send the Massachusetts National Guard to assist at the border came while Democrats were kicking off their party convention in Worcester earlier this month. Jay Gonzalez, the gubernatorial candidate endorsed by that convention, visited the press riser at the DCU Center to say he would not have complied with the Pentagon's request as Baker did.

"If Donald Trump's Pentagon made that type of request to me I would not comply with it," Gonzalez told reporters hours after the News Service first reported on the National Guard's plans. "We need to stand up to what he's doing and we've got a governor right now who doesn't do it and on this issue he not only doesn't stand up to him he helps him."

On Sunday, Gonzalez circulated a petition to supporters calling on Baker to reconsider his decision and to instead withhold Massachusetts resources from the border mission.

"Gov. Baker's commitment of Massachusetts National Guard personnel and equipment might have been before the horrific family break-up policy was in full-swing, but it's not too late for the governor to do the right thing and withdraw support," Gonzalez wrote in the email to supporters.

Bob Massie, another Democrat running for governor, said Monday afternoon that Baker's decision to rescind the state's support for the border mission was "too little, too late."

The Baker administration downplayed its cooperation with the Trump administration's border security efforts when it was announced, noting that the request for resources and personnel was relatively small and that Massachusetts has assisted with border operations for both Democrat and Republican presidents.

Massachusetts National Guardsmen were activated to support Operation Jump Start under President George W. Bush from 2006 to 2008 and Operation Phalanx under President Barack Obama. STATEHOUSE NEWS SERVICE

Millionaire's tax off November's ballot

Voters will not have a say on the proposed income surtax in November's election.

KRISTIN TOUSSAINT
kristin.toussaint@metro.us

Voters will no longer have the opportunity to weigh in on whether or not the state should impose the so-called millionaire's tax, an income surtax on the state's highest earning residents, after the state's highest court struck the question from the November ballot.

The Supreme Judicial Court ruled on Monday that the question mixes together subjects which are not "related or mutually dependent," i.e., spending priorities for education and transportation and a change in the state's tax policy, and thus should not appear on the November ballot.

"Including it on the ballot would place a reasonable voter in the 'untenable position of casting a single vote on two or more dissimilar subjects,'" states the court's decision, written by Justice Frank Gaziano.

The proposed millionaire's tax would have raised an estimated $2 billion earmarked for education, including affordable public colleges and universities, and transportation repair and maintenance efforts by imposing a 4 percent surtax on those with an income of more than $1 million. The move ensures that the state's flat income tax will remain in place.

Supporters of the proposal also dubbed it the "Fair Share Amendment." Massachusetts Attorney General Maura Healey

The so-called millionaire's tax will no longer appear on the Massachusetts November ballot. FLICKR CREATIVE COMMONS ruled in September that the proposed amendment met the state's constitutional requirements and was certified to appear on the November 2018 ballot.

Certain business groups opposed the proposal, though, and challenged the constitutionality of the amendment. Those opposing groups took the AG to court and asked the Supreme Judicial Court to block the millionaire's tax from appearing on the ballot.

"We conclude that the initiative petition should not have been certified by the attorney general," the court's ruling states.

Supporters are dismayed at the news. In a statement, Raise Up Massachusetts said it is "incredibly disappointed that a few wealthy corporate executives and their lobbyists brought this lawsuit that blocked the right of Massachusetts voters to amend our state's constitution."

Polls: Transgender protection repeal gaining support

GETTY IMAGES

A measure that would overturn a state law that protects transgender individuals in public spaces such as bathrooms may appear on the November ballot — and it seems to have some support.

The transgender protections law was passed in 2016 and specifically outlaws discrimination against transgender people in public places such as parks, restaurants and public bathrooms. It allows transgender individuals to access the public spaces that align with their identified gender rather than the one at which they were assigned at birth.

According to a recent Suffolk University/Boston Globe poll, 37 percent of 500 voters surveyed said that they would support repealing the law and 49 percent of people opposed repealing it, instead in favor of keeping the protections. About 13 percent of people were undecided on the issue and about 1 percent refused to answer.

A WBUR poll also looked at the issue back in May and found there was slightly more support to keep the law in place, with 52 percent of residents supporting the law and 38 percent supporting its repeal.

The effort to repeal the law is backed by Keep MA Safe. The group has launched a campaign calling the transgender protections "dangerous" for children.

Experience campus life a little early with these summer programs

patrick.king@metro.us

Making the transition from high school to college can be a bit of a rude awakening for many students. At its worst, dorm life can be a lot like the inmates running the asylum as college freshman are likely to be experiencing their first real tastes of freedom away from their childhood homes. Easing into campus culture is a necessity for new students. This is exactly what the Summer Term at Boston University for high school juniors and seniors sets out to do each year.

These summer courses will allow high school students to learn alongside other Boston University undergrads. Students can choose to take courses online as well, but being on campus for this program is definitely part of the fun as students will be able to experience lectures, projects and discussions that will put them in the heart of our country's number one college town.

Experiencing the campus life

Students who choose to choose to fully immerse themselves with the campus can spend Summer Term living in a real college dorm at Boston University's Warren

Towers. Students will be paired with roommates who are also enrolled in this program out of high school and will be given access to all of the dining options the school has to offer. Guidance will be provided by Resident Program Assistants who will not only supervise these students during their term, but will also coordinate fun activities all summer long.

Parents can rest assured that these towers include 24-hour security and these young men and young women will reside in separate towers.

Summer Term Programs

Boston University will begin offering several programs for high school students in July.

The High School Honors program for rising high school juniors and seniors will start on July 1 and run for six weeks. Students will be able to choose from 80 different BU courses, earning up to eight college credits. Also starting on July 1 will be the RISE Internship program for high school seniors. This program will also run for six weeks but will include university-level research instead of college credit. Juniors and seniors who are looking to study psychology or medicine and would like to familiarize themselves with campus life can sign up for the three-week Academic Immersion program.

For students looking for the college lecture experience — sophomores, juniors, and seniors can enroll in the Summer Challenge, where they can choose two out of 20 lectures over two weeks to help broaden their horizons. For one week starting on July 22, entering freshman and rising sophomores can enroll in the school's Summer Preview, which will include a weeklong seminar giving students a sneak peek inside the campus walls so they can get a better idea of what college is really like.

If you are looking to broaden your horizons before heading off to your first year as an undergrad, the Summer Term at Boston University is for you. Make sure to check out a full schedule and programs that are available today over at bu.edu/summer/high-school-programs.

What should you look for in a graduate program?

Don't lock yourself into a program that isn't a right fit for you.

patrick.king@metro.us

The pressure may be on you once you have earned your undergraduate degree to look for a graduate program to help further your studies. After close to 20 years of sitting in desks, listening to prepared lessons, you may be in a rush to pick a school and get all of your studies out of the way by choosing the first graduate program you find (and that accepts you). But there are many factors you should consider before choosing a school to help you get a leg up in your career. After all, on top of this being a big life decision, attending earning your master's degree is also a big financial decision that will affect you for many years. Here are some things that you should consider before choosing your graduate program.

Weigh all of your options before you take the next step. ALL PHOTOS ISTOCK

Make sure you are going for the right reasons

You may have dabbled in screen printing electives in college and had a complete blast — but is that really the career you want for the rest of your life? You should really take the time to think about the industry and the kinds of jobs you would like to have before locking yourself into a program that might not be a right fit for you.

Talk to alumni and faculty

Once you have narrowed down your choices of schools to a small, select group, you should really get a sense of what the campus culture is like as well as what the programs you would like to enroll in entail. Try to set up a meeting with a member of the school's faculty, a currently enrolled student or an alumni of the program you are interested in. Find out what made them gravitate toward that school and what they especially like and dislike about it. Their answers may surprise you and help you make up your mind a little easier.

Experience that will matter in the real world

While earning your master's degree will look great on your resume, many jobs will be looking for candidates who have a considerable amount of actual work experience. Make sure that the graduate program you have chosen will include either field work or internships that will give you the kind of experience they are looking for.

Look for the best job placement rates

When looking at programs, you should hold each school accountable for the results they have produced in the past. For instance, the Masters in Teaching (MAT) program at UMass Amherst has a 100 percent job placement rate for all graduates who studied to become Latin teachers. By knowing what you can expect after you earn your degree, you can more easily justify committing your time and money to a graduate program.

The case for choosing a grad school close to home

"Mom... Dad...
I'm home!"

PAT KING
patrick.king@metro.us

Ever since the day you held your highschool diploma in your hands, you've probably wanted to keep the poster cluttered bedroom walls of your childhood bedroom as a distant memory. But now that you been away earning your undergrad for the past four years, the time has come to figure out where you plant your flag while you are attending grad school. You may laugh at the thought of it, but here are some reasons why you should seriously consider choosing a grad school close to home.

Home will help you focus

You read that right. Now use it as your personal mantra. Even though your "dorm-life" years while you earned your undergrad gave you a sense of freedom to make a mess of your living quarters, that kind of sloppy aesthetic will only bog you down when you are trying to earn your graduate degree. By living under the iron fist of your parents — paternal and maternal landlords — you will be forced to keep your living space up to their standards.

You will be working toward your future

One thing that living with your parents will seriously hammer into your skull is that you will be as motivated as ever to save up and move away from home after you have finished your graduate degree. But unlike living in a dorm, you will be able to balance your work and school life without having the stresses of coming up with rent and paying other household bills. Use this time to save up so that you can move on your own terms with a degree that will help you join the workforce at an advantage.

Let's face it — you're too old for the dining hall

As you approach your mid-to-late twenties you should start treating your body like the temple it is. Maybe it's time to retire your days of the all-you-can-eat frenzy that you used to subject yourself to while earning your bachelor's degree. Living at home will bring your eating habits back down to earth — to a degree — and help you to set your diet staples for when you begin your life away from home.

You can't beat in-state tuition

We can make all of these cases to you for why choosing a grad school close to home can help you save money, eat better and get your mind right. But, possibly the most monumental benefit of choosing a school close to home is the money you will save by paying in-state tuition. According to U.S. News, the average price for in-state graduate school tuition for a public university is close to $30,000 — including living costs — as opposed to out-of-state, which is nearly a third more. If you cut down on housing costs by living at home, you will be thankful not to carry around that debt like a boulder on your back for the next 10 to 20 years.

Maybe your parents will be fun roommates?

Michael Brun talks 'Positivo,' World Cup predictions and remembering Avicii

The DJ opens up about teaming up with J Balvin, his Haitian roots and more.

mattjuul@metro.us

If you've tuned into Telemundo to watch the World Cup, chances are you've heard the music of Michael Brun at some point during the broadcast. The network is using "Positivo," the hit track by Brun and singer J Balvin, as its musical anthem for this year's matches. Local fans will get to hear the tune live, however, when the popular DJ performs at the Middle East in Cambridge this weekend.

While Brun hails from Haiti and now calls Brooklyn home, he has a lot of love for the Boston area, as he once studied at Boston University for a summer course and also has family that lives in the area. "I have a special place in my heart for Boston," Brun tells Metro. "I really can't wait to be there."

Ahead, we chat with Brun about the World Cup, his memories of Avicii and more.

How exciting is it to hear Telemundo use 'Positivo' for its World Cup theme song?

Seeing it being used for the World Cup is so incredible to me. That's the dream that I have that I never actually thought could happen. It's something that was always a far-off idea, but it came so naturally. I got to work with J Balvin. I first got in touch with him about a year ago while I was making the song "Bayo," which is the Creole version of "Positivo." While I was working on that, we got connected, I sent him the beat that I was making and he loved it. A week after we were put in touch, he sent me back "Positivo," he sent me back the vocals and it was so amazing, I couldn't believe it. At that point, I didn't know it was going to be for the World Cup. It wasn't until a few months ago, he gave me a call and asked me, just like out of the blue, "Hey, the label contacted me.

There's a chance that this could potentially be used for the World Cup. Is it cool with you?" And I told him, "Why are you even asking me, man? This is such a crazy opportunity."

Who do you think will win the World Cup?

It's interesting. I mean, a lot of Haitians are big Brazil supporters, so I'm going to be looking out for Brazil, looking out for Germany as well, a really incredible team. I'm going to be watching every game that I possibly can.

What makes the sounds of Haiti so unique?

I think a big part of it is that Haitian music, the traditional Haitian music, so like Rara music and African music, that's very tribal, sounds that were passed down generations through families with drums and horns. That sound is culturally linked to the story of the country, to the development of Haiti as what it is today from the slave trade from over 200 to 300 years ago. So to see that and to hear those sounds today, it almost feels like you're being transported through history.

As a member of the EDM community, how will you remember Avicii?

One of my first-ever shows I did in my career was opening for Avicii in Haiti. I got to meet him right as he was about to release his song "Levels." It was a crazy, crazy time period. That was when I was starting to get my moment as well, and getting support from other DJs. He was such a genuinely nice guy and so talented. I think that during this entire tragedy with his life and what happened, it felt like looking in a mirror in a lot of ways, because that to me is what so many young artists are going through, in every sense, where your life is changing so fast and you want to stay passionate, you want to stay grounded. I'm grateful that I got to meet with him and that he was a huge inspiration for me in my life.

'Detroiders' is a 'Mad Men' spoof that actually cares

Season 2 of the hit series debuts on Comedy Central this week.

ANDREW HUSBAND
letters@metro.us

When real-life best friends Sam Richardson and Tim Robinson's "Detroiders," an offbeat comedy series about best friends-cum-ad men, premiered last year on Comedy Central, everyone fell in love with what the Hollywood Reporter called "a funny, generous Midwestern sitcom."

In many ways the show, which is produced by Robinson's old "Saturday Night Live" boss Lorne Michaels, is just that: a warm, unassuming comedy about the Motor City. It's not yet another television farce based (or shot) in Los Angeles or New York, but a quirky love letter to one of the Midwest's largest urban areas. Sam and Tim's characters, the supporting cast and frequent guest stars — and not Detroit — are the jokes' chief targets, though in a genial fashion.

On Thursday, the first two episodes of "Detroiders" season 2 will premiere on Comedy Central starting at 10 p.m. Much like the first season, Sam, Tim and the rest of the gang at Cramblin Duvet are yet again trying to become the small-time ad kings of the city.

To do this, they set about trying to attract bigger clients, like the Michigan Science Center and legendary Detroit news anchor Mort Crim, who guest stars as himself. Other cameos this season include Tim Meadows, Bobby Moynihan, Mary Lynn Rajskub, Faizon Love, Amber Ruffin, Jerry Minor, Conner O'Malley, Nora Dunn and University of Michigan football coach Jim Harbaugh.

The Detroit-specific lens notwithstanding, "Detroiders" is also dedicated to spoofing the far more serious "Mad Men" whenever it can. Audiences familiar with the critically acclaimed AMC who also don't mind the occasional parody will appreciate, if not love, what this Comedy Central series tries to do.

As Vulture's season 1 review put it, "watching 'Detroiders' feels like observing what happens when a pair of Second City alums get access to the 'Mad Men' set and decide to go improv-crazy." This is precisely what Richardson and Robinson do, and it's wonderful.

Judging by the five episodes Comedy Central made available to critics, the second season of "Detroiders" is on pace to keep up with its predecessor. Viewers who haven't watched most, or any, of season 1 may want to brush up on what's happened, though binging it on demand isn't necessary. Much of the comedy from Richardson, Robinson and fellow writers

Zach Kanin and Joe Kelly is quite boundless, while the stories are as easily digestible as they are enjoyable.

"Detroiders" season 2 premieres Thursday, June 21 at 10 p.m. on Comedy Central.

How true is 'The Catcher Was A Spy'?

Here's what director Ben Lewin told us.

GREGORY WAKEMAN
Gregory.Wakeman@metro.us

Ben Lewin immediately knew that he had to tell the extraordinary true story of Moe Berg, the former Red Sox player and World War II spy who lived an incredible life shrouded in mystery.

The Australian director hadn't heard of Berg, who is played by Paul Rudd in the film, before being given the script for "The Catcher Was A Spy," but he recently told Metro that the story immediately sparked his interest for a number of reasons.

"Stories come along, and every now and then, one makes you sit up and take notice because you haven't heard it before," Lewin says. "I have often been fascinated by obscure World War II stories that no one knows about. And this was about a very elusive character and the birth of the bomb. Which was a big part of my generation, and it was a fear that really hung over my generation."

"So I found those elements really compelling," he adds. "Especially because at the center of this world-changing event was this unlikely character."

The mystery surrounding Berg, from his career as an average baseball player to his incredible intelligence in certain aspects of his private life, meant that it was always going to be hard for "The Catcher Was A Spy" to be completely true. Especially when it came to his spying on German theoretical physicist Werner Heisenberg, who Berg was instructed to kill if he suspected that the scientist was on the brink of creating a nuclear bomb.

"The Catcher Was A Spy" tells the (mostly) true story of Moe Berg.

But Lewin was more than happy to blend truth with a little bit of myth and cinematic poetry with "The Catcher Was A Spy," though.

"I don't know any historical film that doesn't take artistic license. History is not written like a script," Lewin says. "When you read history of any kind you assume there is a level of truth and a level of interpretation. I felt that most about what I read about Moe was based on proper historical sources. Particularly Nicholas Dawidoff's book."

"What was actually said between Moe and Heisenberg [Mark Strong] during their walk together, which effectively decided Heisenberg's fate, no one knows," he adds. "That's speculation. In a way that's part of the attraction, that sense of mystery over what was said and what drove people's decisions."

Lewin reveals that some moments in the movie are "pure poetic license," such as a scene set in a synagogue.

"I thought, 'Moe undoubtedly must have had moments of serious reflection about what he was going to do.' I wanted to set that in the context of a synagogue on a High Holiday, which I think was innocent political license," Lewin says. "The question of Moe's emotional get-up is also very vague. We followed what material there was about his personal life. I think that if you are telling history you have a responsibility to make it entertaining and dramatic. But at the same time not tell it wrong. Not to distort the essential elements."

Even after making "The Catcher Was A Spy," and watching it premiere at the Sundance Film Festival earlier this year, Lewin admits that he is still endlessly intrigued by the character of Berg.

"I learned a lot of extraordinary things about Moe. One was that he turned down the Medal of Freedom that he was given," Lewin says. "I couldn't figure out why he did that. I am still speculating why. He was a man of many contradictions. He never had a driver's license, he never drove a car, he never had an address, I was more intrigued by what I couldn't figure out rather than what I could."

"The Catcher Was A Spy" debuts June 22.

There is no such thing as having 'too much power.'

MATT BURKE
matthew.burke@metro.us

Last week The Athletic's Ken Rosenthal floated a rumor that the Red Sox may be looking at acquiring Baltimore's Manny Machado ahead of the July 31 MLB trade deadline.

"The Red Sox rank 28th in OPS at third base, and a trade for Machado would be a vintage Dave Dombrowski stunner," Rosenthal wrote. "Would the Sox give up say, five-plus years of third baseman Rafael Devers if the Orioles also included one of their potential free agent relievers, Zach Britton or Brad Brach, and maybe a prospect?"

This led to several days of "would you or wouldn't you?" on Boston sports radio as it pertains to parting with a young talent like Devers in exchange for Machado, who would most likely only be a three-month rental. Machado wants to get paid in a big way this winter, and the Red Sox already have the highest team payroll in baseball so this likely would not be a long-term deal.

That said, Machado could absolutely put a World Series contender like the Red Sox over the top. Machado is fifth in MLB in home runs with 18, is second to JD Martinez in MLB RBIs with 55, and has a .377 OBP – good for 10 in all of baseball.

The Red Sox have had great success at the plate so far this season compared to last as they are currently second in MLB in runs scored and are second in total home runs. But given that the Sox will see power hitting clubs like the Yankees (first in home runs), Indians (third in home runs) and Astros (sixth in home runs) in the postseason – it's not a bad idea to load up on as many talented big bats as possible.

Devers has had his struggles this year at the dish despite a recent 10-game hit streak. The 21-year-old third baseman is hitting just .239 this season with 11 home runs and 35 RBIs.

One other option for Dombrowski and the Red Sox would be to look at trading Xander Bogaerts instead of Devers. Bogaerts was mentioned as the primary trade piece when "Machado to the Red Sox" rumors first hit this past winter and at the time Bogaerts' stock around baseball was painfully low. To his credit, Bogaerts has built his offense back up to the point where he hit out of the three hole the other night.

When the Bogaerts rumors were hot, the Orioles were said to only be interested in "two young, controllable starting pitchers" in return. The Sox' farm system is currently ranked No. 27 in MLB by Bleacher Report, so the Sox would not exactly be talking from a position of power when it comes to trade talks with embattled O's GM Dan Duquette.

Duquette is almost surely going to be fired this year anyway (Orioles owners reportedly met with former Dodgers GM Ned Colletti recently), so he may now be open to deal with the franchise that let him go 16 years ago in the Red Sox.
